Have you thought about why you do safety? Three of the common reasons that people pay attention to safety are:

- 1) Compliance
- 2) Financial Costs
- 3) Moral obligation

No one of those three is more or less "right" than any of the others. In fact, many people and companies move frequently from one motivator to another. The point is that you can be far more effective in getting good results from your safety efforts if you know why you, your crew, and your boss are interested in safety—and those could all be different "whys." If your boss really cares about the costs, make sure you present your efforts and results in terms of money invested and money saved. Understand the Why and you'll get better results.

Whenever you hold a safety meeting or any training session, consider these tips to make the most of the time and energy that you're investing:

- ① Choose a training location that is as quiet as possible and has minimal distractions.
 - about hard hats or safety glasses, tell the crew to put them on, then they have to be involved.
- ② Use well-written material that is easy to understand.
- ③ Match your training topics to the work that your people are doing; relevance improves learning and retention.
- ④ Get their attention by making eye contact; look up frequently while you read.
- ⑤ Keep their attention by asking questions during the meeting; read the meeting beforehand and think of just one or two questions.
- ⑥ Engage your crew in the meeting: if you're talking
 - ⑦ Bring props and samples (gloves, tools, a fall harness)—show and tell.
 - ⑧ Get your crew physically involved: have someone demonstrate how to put on a fall harness, or have everyone inspect their hard hats.
 - ⑨ Go to the source: hold an Aerial Lift meeting at a lift; show them the controls and where to tie off.
 - ⑩ Always "walk the talk;" if you and management don't follow the rules, the employees never will.

Copyright, Ethics, and Your Responsibilities

Safety Meeting Outlines, Inc. expects you to act ethically regarding copyright

There has been considerable press about intellectual property theft and copyright issues in the recent past. At Safety Meeting Outlines, Inc. we don't have a fancy, legalese license agreement that you have to sign, nor do we make you agree to a notarized copyright contract. We expect our customers act responsibly, ethically, and honestly. It's that simple. You want credit for the work that you do; we want credit for the work we do.

Your subscription price is based on the number of people you train with the Weekly Safety Meetings

We are in the business of providing safety training information. That information creates value for you and your company every time it helps one of your people avoid an accident or an injury. Because the value is created in the people who are receiving the training, we ask to be paid based on how the training is conducted and who is being trained.

All Weekly Safety Meetings are protected by copyright and by your respect

When you purchase a Standard Subscription or Select Edition, you should purchase an appropriate number of copies of the Weekly Safety Meetings. Usually this means that you should purchase a copy for each crew; sometimes it's a copy for each supervisor. Don't make photocopies (of course, copying a signed meeting for record keeping purposes is acceptable).

If you purchase a Premium Membership, choose a membership level that represents the number of people who will be trained. Yes, that number will vary; just give us an honest estimate. The membership level is based on the number of people being trained, not the number of supervisors or trainers doing the training. Count anyone that attends your safety meetings, including your sub-contractors if you train them. Again, we aren't asking for a day-by-day head count; we ask for an honest estimate.

Be honest. Be ethical. Respect our copyright.
